

count to its rivals, according to sources.

The exit of Sikka was expected to bring in certain sense of uncertainty among the clients with the likelihood of competitors making a beeline to them. "Infosys has certainly not lost any major client and the credit should go not only to the current top management, but also to the sales force on the ground," said an executive familiar.

Infosys announced the resignation of Sikka as CEO on August 18, and there was a brief period of uncertainty as the company announced the return of founder Nandan Nilekani as the non-executive chairman on August 24. Nilekani, during his earlier tenure at Infosys, was generally regarded as a person with very good networking skills and maintaining excellent relationship with the clients.

UB Pravin Rao, the interim CEO of Infosys, during a Citi Global Technology Conference held in September, had said they had gone out on a massive outreach programme with their clients. "Many of the clients are saying that they are sad to see Vishal leave. They enjoyed all the interaction they had with him. But at the same time, they have also talked about the fact that the relationships between both organisations last beyond individuals. In many cases we have had relationships spanning over a decade or so," he said.

In the IT services business, companies strive to have long-term relationship with their clients which ensure that there is certain stickiness and the resultant repeat business which comes along with it. In many cases, companies have a couple of anchor clients which provide bulk of the business.
